The undergraduate minor in Law, Societies, and Justice provides an opportunity for students to develop a multidisciplinary liberal arts orientation to the study of law, social control, and justice, with particular emphasis on the studies of crime, comparative law, and human rights. This knowledge is gained through critical examination of the research literature and exchange of ideas and information with other students and faculty.

An LSJ Minor Checklist and a handout containing the list of Approved Courses for LSJ (both effective Autumn 2011) can be found on the LSJ Student Forms page.

If you were admitted to the LSJ minor prior to Autumn 2011, see the Pre-Autumn 2011 Minor Requirements handout on the Student Forms page.

How to Declare a Minor

Students can declare a minor in Law, Societies, and Justice by meeting with their major adviser and completing a short form. The LSJ minor is not competitive, and it does not require completion of coursework in LSJ before it can be declared. Any student declared in any undergraduate major and with at least 45 completed college credits can declare a minor in LSJ.

For the LSJ minor, students may use additional LSJ Core Courses towards the Subfield requirements. LSJ 320/POL S 368, LSJ 321/ANTH 323, and LSJ/JSIS A 324 count in “Rights.” All other LSJ Core Courses count in “Comparative Legal Institutions.” This is intended to help students progress towards completion of the minor, but since the LSJ Core Courses are considered introductory, students are encouraged to give preference to the actual subfield courses as listed on the LSJ Approved Courses list.

*LSJ 380, 381, 430, 490, and 491 are variable-topic courses. The topic for a specific offering will be listed on the Time Schedule and also on the Quarterly Course Offerings handouts (available outside the LSJ advising office).
